

Dear President Bush:

My name is _____. As an air traveler in the US, I wish to address a concern that probably reflects the concerns of most of the fellow travelers. This concern regards taking shoes off at the security checkpoint in the airport. Although I do understand and accept the responsibility of removing my shoes for security reasons and my protection, I am very concerned about the germs (harmful bacteria, virus, fungi, and other microorganisms) on the floor that are transmitted from one person to another at the security checkpoint. No one that I meet or have met while traveling likes to take off their shoes and not be worried about what dirty, harmful germs they are stepping on and carrying into their shoes as they put them back on. (Yuck! Yuck! and more Yuck!)

To address the issues of the germs potentially being transmitted through the floor contact at the security checkpoints, I have heard there is a company called JohDar Corp. who has developed a publicly safe and affordable solution. Their anti-germ technology will benefit all travelers and protect everyone from the potentially harmful germs being transmitted through the floor contact at the security checkpoint. I ask that you, Mr. President and the United States Government, take a look at this product and work with JohDar Corp. on this issue for the good and protection of us all.

I would like to thank you for your time and attentiveness on this very important issue.

Sincerely,

Signed: _____
